To Whom It May Concern,

Approximately a year ago, I offered a reward of \$1,000,000.00 in an attempt to ask a highly controversial question about vaccine safety and efficacy. The reward offer was sent out to news agencies all over the world and posted in many places on the world-wide-web. I appeared on radio broadcasts as well and mentioned the reward to thousands of listeners. After all this time, no one answered the question, and no one offered to register for the reward. The intent of the reward was to substantiate that vaccines and drugs are not the most safe and effective solutions towards addressing pandemics or viral outbreaks by posing the question to the world, and especially challenging vaccine and drug proponents.

In that there were no vaccine proponents willing to register for the substantial reward, it is obvious that vaccine proponents, including vaccine suppliers and manufacturers, do not have confidence in the safety and efficacy of vaccines. Furthermore, the average person may also conclude that there are other means, besides medical immunization, such as natural immunization that may be more safe and effective than vaccines.

Being that the reward and the lack of responses from vaccine proponents has been public for such a long time, I feel that the goal of the reward, the intent of which has been stated above, has been a complete success in revealing that vaccines are not the most safe and effective alternative for addressing pandemics and viral outbreaks. The reward is now no longer available.

In conclusion, it should be clear to the public now that they consider seeking out other viable alternatives to vaccines, and that vaccines have not been proven to be more safe and effective than anything else. Bionaid and ZeoHeal were exclusively used as ideal testing subjects for research purposes only, give vaccine proponents materials for comparison purposes only, and not intended to make any claims that Bionaid and ZeoHeal are intended to mitigate, prevent, or cure any disease, including H1N1. Bionaid and ZeoHeal are exclusively for supporting the immune system with commonly known nutritional constituents that provide nutrition to the body so that it may be able to defend itself through natural immunization.

Respectfully,
